It is an irony that these other young people in "The Golden Age" are the only ones who do not receive the same intense interest and respect as the narrator is. The narrator's feelings are so strong, he is given more credit than even his own father is. He is frequently called "father," as if he were an important personage, someone dignified by an aristocratic upbringing or a certain amount of knowledge and experience. "I believe that this ignorance, my knowledge of the world is rapidly increasing," he says, "and I am not at all sure that I am not a little better than my father."
