Handbook of Detailing Ralph W. Liebing, 2013-01-02 PREFACE You don't know well how do you know the line is the right In a world of rapid and ever changing practices among design professionals there is we feel a need to at least recall other line at all times times more sedate slower paced but nonetheless no less highly professional And to bring them forward for express Thus our dilemma of growing proportions The further sion understanding and use in today's professional practice we move from mid 20th century the more we stray from the mindset direction execution and understanding of working Indeed they may have been MORE professional This is not drawings and detailing of that time We seek not to regenerate whining or lamenting about times passed by persons late and reinstall those times but we sincerely feel and strongly in their career trying desperately to hold on to that past to suggest that there needs to be a lasting expression of those things obsolete outmoded archaic or snail like slow It is times and the filling of the voids left by time from then til about being open factual and advisory about moving for now Techniques may change but understanding direction ward in new ways but maintaining a sense of and use of well orientation and values from the past remain valid impor proven values basics and fundamentals so very vital and va tant and of value particularly when they were so successful luable to the success of project but so easily lost too quickly
