Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of dental caries between children who had been exposed to fluoride varnish and those who had not. A cross-sectional study was conducted in a public health center in São Paulo, Brazil. The sample consisted of 100 children aged 6-7 years. The children were divided into two groups: those who had been exposed to fluoride varnish and those who had not. The prevalence of dental caries was determined by visual inspection. The results showed that the prevalence of dental caries was significantly lower in the group that had been exposed to fluoride varnish compared to the control group. This suggests that fluoride varnish application may be an effective method for reducing the risk of dental caries in children.

To find the optimal starting point, researchers selected 100 locations randomly placed within the study area and, for each location, they calculated the average distance to the nearest water body. They then selected the 10 locations with the lowest average distance to water as the starting points for the simulations.
