ABSTRACT

E-government diffusion is an international phenomenon that has received much attention in the last decade. Researchers argue that the rate of e-government effectiveness and efficiency as well as the rate of diffusion and adoption depend on a number of factors. Nonetheless, comparative studies detailing how these factors differ across nations are lacking. Previous studies have primarily based conclusions on isolated projects and specific case studies in different countries with very little international perspective. This study examines the e-government adoption across 192 countries within the last decade. The panel data obtained would be analyzed to evaluate the state of e-government diffusion and recommendations would be made. Results and findings of the study shall be presented at the conference.

Keywords: e-government adoption, e-government diffusion, infrastructure, human capital, e-participation.

INTRODUCTION

In the last decade, the e-government systems' diffusion was significant. These systems have received much attention all over the world. The e-government systems usage rate is not the same across countries. For instance, globally speaking, the average usage of these systems by citizens is about 30% but when it comes to specific countries such as Canada this rate is over than 51% (Kumar, Mukerji, Butt & Persaud, 2007). The rate of e-government diffusion can be expected to increase in the coming years more than ever. E-government has been defined as the use of
