Cardiac Conduction

The heart has its own system to generate electrical impulses and conduct electrical signals that keep its major blood flow. This electrical system is called the cardiac conduction system. It is made up of specialized tissues and cells that coordinate the heart's electrical activity, including the heart's rhythm, rate, and force of contraction. The heart's electrical system is made up of the sinoatrial node, the atrioventricular node, the bundle of His, and the Purkinje fibers. The sinoatrial node is the heart's natural pacemaker, and it generates the electrical impulses that start the heart's rhythm. The atrioventricular node is the heart's electrical switch, and it delays the electrical impulses for a fraction of a second before passing them on to the bundle of His. The bundle of His is the heart's main electrical pathway, and it carries the electrical impulses down to the Purkinje fibers. The Purkinje fibers are the heart's electrical conductors, and they carry the electrical impulses to the heart's ventricles, where they cause the heart to contract.

The cardiac conduction system is composed of:

Sinoatrial and Atrioventricular Nodes

1. The Sinoatrial Node (SAN)

The sinoatrial node is the heart's natural pacemaker. It is located in the right atrium, near the junction of the superior vena cava and the right atrium. It generates the electrical impulses that start the heart's rhythm.

The sinoatrial node is also the heart's natural pacemaker. It is located in the right atrium, near the junction of the superior vena cava and the right atrium. It generates the electrical impulses that start the heart's rhythm.

2. The Atrioventricular Node (AVN)

The atrioventricular node is the heart's electrical switch. It is located in the right atrium, near the junction of the inferior vena cava and the right atrium. It delays the electrical impulses for a fraction of a second before passing them on to the bundle of His. The bundle of His is the heart's main electrical pathway, and it carries the electrical impulses down to the Purkinje fibers. The Purkinje fibers are the heart's electrical conductors, and they carry the electrical impulses to the heart's ventricles, where they cause the heart to contract.

The Bundle of His

The bundle of His is the heart's main electrical pathway. It is located in the septum between the right and left ventricles. It carries the electrical impulses from the atrioventricular node down to the Purkinje fibers. The Purkinje fibers are the heart's electrical conductors, and they carry the electrical impulses to the heart's ventricles, where they cause the heart to contract.
