The Science of Earthquakes

Ken Hudnut is standing on a rugged hilltop in the mountains outside of Los Angeles. Nearby is a small gray dome supported by four narrow legs planted securely in the ground. Hudnut is a geophysicist with the U.S. Geological Survey, and the contraption next to him is a highly sophisticated Global Positioning System (GPS) receiver. "This station was installed in 1999," Hudnut says. "Within three weeks or so, years since it was installed, it's stable enough to sound like rock!" It's about how fast your fingernails grow—but for a mountain, that's moving at a good clip. At this pace, Los Angeles will run into San Francisco in 15 million years. [In the early 2000s], earthquake researchers had no way to measure the motion of a mountain with such accuracy. But now with GPS, they can monitor the "fingerprints" of tectonic movements.
