Participation Tone Bratteteig, Ina Wagner, 2014-08-07 Providing a critical view on user participation in design disentangling decision making and power in design this book uses fieldwork material from two large participatory design projects one experimental in the field of urban planning the other a product development project within health care Addressing power issues in participatory design is critical to providing a realistic view of the possibilities and limitations of participation Design is decision making during a design process a huge number of decisions taken before the designers end up with a design result an artefact or system All decisions are a choice between possibilities and selecting one of them and making it concrete as a change in an artefact is a demonstration of the capacity to transform which is a key aspect of power Participatory designers are committed to empowering users and facilitating a design process where users are able to take part in all types of decisions This volume explores the challenges for practitioners of participatory design arising from this commitment by asking what participation really means who should participate and in which parts of a design process what does it mean to share power with users how are decisions to be made in a participatory way and what is it that users participate in The book provides a conceptual framework for understanding these issues as well as a fresh look at participation The Routledge
