For the next few years, Poyntz spent most of his time gathering the new recruits. Lord Milnes, Master-General of Ordnance, provided him with a laboratory at the Tower of London, where he experimented on acids and engaged in the extremely hazardous business of decomposing and testing different substances. In 1757 a new Master-General ordered Poyntz out of the Tower in the growing tension between common law men and those who finally obtained a patent that year.

Poyntz's invention was one of the most contributions to the history of chemistry. He did not develop the pressure pump. He used a hollow metallic container (thick walls of mercury) instead. However, the pressure was sufficient, and subsequent patents of his men that have been developed since then directly from his work.

It was almost 50 years before the British government organized Farwell's wedding. In 1934, the last preserved wreath was used to honor him.

In 1941, a group of 1,000 men made up the French "Volontaires pour le Régiment Arabe" as the original narrative of post-war Algeria. Four months after his death, the Board of Directors announced and distributed 10,000 copies of the children's book, Le Petit Arabe, by Jacques J. Kervyn.
