

never turning his back to the Allfather.

His wings buzzing, Loki squeezed through the cracks in the huge front doors of Freyja's hall. He flew unseen down the long, dark passageways until he found his way into Freyja's sleeping chamber.

He landed on her perfect sleeping form, crawling up her arm to where her hand coveted the necklace. Even in sleep, he thought, she covets the thing. How distraught will she be when she discovers it missing?

He lowered his mouth to her flesh and bit deep. She moaned with pain, and her hand flew up to shake him off. He hovered just above, watching. When her hand came back down the necklace was exposed, and he too was astonished by its brilliance.

Hours later, he lay strewn across the bed, body and soul drained of all strength. Freyja propped herself up by an elbow and ran her hand across his chest.

"It has been far too long since we've done that," she said. Loki could only moan in response.

She reached behind her neck, unclasped the necklace, and laid it down onto his stomach. "You came for this, I believe."

With effort, he picked his head up and stared at it. "You are . . . you are giving it to me?"

"You were sent for it, weren't you?"

"How did you know?"

She laughed. "Oh, Loki. You are so clever and yet so foolish. Do you think you are the only one with schemes?"

He rolled over onto his side and picked the necklace up, dangling it just in front of his face. "You planned this? But how could you—"
