

1992-1993 "Green Book" Report, November 1992

Abstract: Longitudinal studies have shown that, in addition to learning changes, the structure of the brain is also affected by learning. However, the extent to which the brain changes in response to learning is still unclear. In this study, we used a longitudinal design to examine the effects of learning on the brain. We used a combination of structural and functional MRI to examine the effects of learning on the brain. We found that learning led to changes in the structure of the brain, including increases in gray matter volume in the hippocampus and decreases in white matter volume in the corpus callosum. These changes were associated with improvements in learning performance. Our findings suggest that learning leads to changes in the brain, which may be related to the changes in learning performance.
