It is an irony that these other young people in "The 400 Blows" are the only ones who do not receive the same intense interest and sympathy as the boy. In contrast to the boy, who is suffering the greatest pain, the other children are the "happy ones" of the film. They are happy because, at least in the beginning, they are not subjected to the same physical and emotional abuse as the boy. The boy's suffering is the central focus of the film, and the other children's lives are shown in a way that suggests they are not as important or as deserving of sympathy as the boy. This is a powerful statement about the value of individual suffering and the importance of empathy.
