It is an irony that these other young people in "The Golden Age" are the only ones who do not receive the same intense interest and respect as the narrator is. The narrator's feelings of being the "golden child" are also a source of great inner anxiety for him. He frequently worries that, as a result of his superior intellect, he might offend his friends by appearing to contradict or contradict himself. He is constantly aware of the possibility that he might offend his friends by appearing to contradict or contradict himself.
