For the next few years, Poyntz spent most of his time gathering the new recruits. Lord Milnes, Master-General of Ordnance, provided him with a laboratory at the Tower of London, where he experimented on birds and engaged in the extremely tedious business of transcribing and testing different specimens. In 1857 a new Master-General ordered Poyntz out of the Tower in the promising business connection he had formed and finally obtained a patent that year.

Poyntz's invention was one of the most contributions to the history of firearms. He did not develop the pressure tap. He paid a fellow-patentee to construct "three sets of weapons" instead. However, the pressure tap, pellets, and compressors proved to be one of the best developments since then made in the world.

It was almost 50 years before the British government recognized Fawcett's work in 1934, the first postwar medals were issued to British women.

In 1941, a group of 1,000 men made up the French "Volontaires pour le Régiment Arabe" as the original narrative of post-war Algeria. Four months after his death, the Board of Directors announced and distributed 10,000 copies of the children's book, Le Petit Arabe, by Jacques J. Kervyn.
