As noted earlier, the 1990s witnessed a dramatic increase in the number of U.S. firms operating in foreign markets. This increase was driven by a number of factors, including the globalization of markets, the need for firms to diversify their product lines, and the desire to reduce costs by moving production to lower-cost countries. The result was a significant increase in the number of U.S. firms operating in foreign markets, which in turn led to a significant increase in the number of U.S. firms operating in foreign markets.
