A Life of General Robert E. Lee John Esten Cooke, 2004-06-01 The decisive moment had now arrived which was to test him. He was placed in command of the largest and most important army in the Confederacy, and to him was intrusted the defence of the capital, not only of Virginia but of the South. If Richmond were to fall, the Confederate Congress, executive and heads of departments would all be fugitives. The evacuation of Virginia might or might not follow, but in the very commencement of the conflict, the enemy would achieve an immense advantage. Recognition by the European powers would be hopeless in such an event, and the wandering and fugitive government of the Confederacy would excite only contempt.
