- As opposed to other theories and writings focused on childhood development, the lifespan developmental theory offers an organizational framework through which developmental psychologists can understand the link between middle adulthood and childhood or old age. And thus, the lifespan developmental theory covers all the processes regarding ontogeny (Broderick & Blewitt, 2003, p. 417).
- The lifespan developmental theory offers counselors and other helping professionals a logical way of assessing and interpreting the challenges and possibilities that adults face, and therefore, helping them to achieve effective development (Broderick & Blewitt, 2003, pp. 416-417).
- To achieve the therapeutic and psycho-educational goals relative to development, helping professionals need to consider different elements of the life span developmental theory including the gains and losses in development; the growth, maintenance, and regulation of loss relative to development; defining successful or effective development at any age, and identifying various influences on adult development.
- The gains and losses in development arise from the interaction between biological processes and physical/environmental influences at any point in people's lives (Broderick & Blewitt, 2003, p. 417).
- Therefore, for children to develop into fully functioning adults, their biological processes become optimal in typical environments coupled with cultural supports resulting in successful development.
- As persons enter adulthood life, the biological processes begin to weaken signaling the completion of the reproductive process and the beginning of biological dysfunctions (Broderick & Blewitt, 2003, p. 417).
- Biological dysfunctions in middle adulthood life (ages 30-55 years) are further accelerated by modern cultures including economics, lifestyles, technology, and nutrition.
- Therefore, lifespan development relative to age entails gains during the childhood stage and losses during adulthood and old age stages.

Nursing of Autism Spectrum Disorder Ellen Giarelli, Marcia Gardner, 2012-04-09 This book helps move healthcare forward by recognizing the range of issues across the lifespan that people with ASD may face and brings together a wealth of expertise with information and strategies across the lifespan. From the Foreword by Catherine Rice PhD, National Center on Birth Defects and Developmental Disabilities, Center for Disease Control and Prevention. Autism Spectrum Disorder (ASD) is a growing health problem, and nearly all nurses are likely to care for individuals with ASD. Designed as a textbook and a reference, this volume prepares nurses to recognize the unique challenges of providing evidence-based health care that meets the special needs of ASD patients across the lifespan and in multiple practice settings. Chapters include setting specific case studies followed by consistently formatted information about key clinical issues, clinical assessment, and best practice nursing plans of care. The book is organized on a social model of disability with a focus on the environmental, cultural, and economic barriers encountered by people with ASD. It highlights the significant role played by nurses in the treatment of ASD patients and helps nurses integrate the specialized information about ASD into their clinical practice. Each section of the book reflects a different life stage and is organized to include learning objectives and developmental needs at the beginning of a section, with key points, a guide to clinical problem solving, and thought-provoking review questions at the end.

Key Features: Provides evidence-based information for nurses about the special treatment needs of individuals with ASD. Explains how functional deficits of people with ASD complicate health care delivery and how nurses can use this knowledge to provide quality care. Addresses clinical issues across the lifespan and in multiple settings through case studies that illustrate best practice nursing care for a variety of problems. Ideal for continuing education programs, post-master's certificate programs, and school nurse certification programs.
