

f) Régulation de la pression sanguine : C'est dans les vaisseaux sanguins que ce fait le contrôle de la pression sanguine. Une diminution du volume sanguin provoque généralement une chute de la pression sanguine  $\Rightarrow$  hypotension et inversement. On parle d'hémorragie si la perte de sang est supérieure au 1/3 de la masse sanguine.

g) Régulation de l'équilibre acido-basique : Le sang maintient l'équilibre entre les acides et les bases dans l'organisme. Toute augmentation des acides  $\Rightarrow$  acidose, et une diminution des acides  $\Rightarrow$  alcalose.

h) Régulation thermique : Le sang contrôle la température corporelle par la distribution de la chaleur organique. Cette chaleur est éliminée au niveau de la peau et les poumons.

i) Défense contre les infections : par les leucocytes (globules blancs) et les anticorps circulants.

j) Transport des hormones : Le sang assure le transport des hormones aux organes cibles et à toutes les cellules de l'organisme. Il joue un rôle capital dans la régulation et la coordination du métabolisme ; ex : ADH et aldostérone  $\Rightarrow$  régulation hydrique, insuline  $\Rightarrow$  glycémie...etc.

Remarque : La rapidité du transport est grande puisque la totalité du sang passe dans le cœur en une minute.

III- Constituants du sang : Le sang est une suspension d'éléments cellulaires dans une solution aqueuse appelé le plasma. Les deux phases (phase cellulaire et phase aqueuse) peuvent être séparées. La fraction occupée par les globules rouges est appelée hématocrite. Elle est comprise entre 30-40% chez les animaux. Une diminution de l'hématocrite indique une anémie. Le sang peut être fractionné entre ses différents composants de deux façons : (voir les figures ci-dessous).

$\Rightarrow$  Lorsque le sang est prélevé sur un anticoagulant et soumis ensuite à une centrifugation, les globules rouges se sédimentent au fond en premier. Les globules blancs se déposent sur les globules rouges et le surnageant jaunâtre est appelé plasma. Dans ce cas là, une simple agitation permet de mélanger tous ces composants et de les remettre en suspension à son état initial.
