Lab: An "Eggsample" Look

Geologists dig deep to get an idea of what Earth looks like inside. Unfortunately, they cannot dig all the way to the core. However, geologists can use earthquakes to help them "see" inside Earth. When an earthquake happens, it sends shock waves through the planet. Earthquake waves travel differently when they pass through liquids and solids. A geologist can tell if it was solid or liquid material that the waves passed through when they receive earthquake data. By recording a number of earthquakes, geologists have a pretty good idea of what our Earth looks like inside. A core sample would be more accurate, but is not possible today. To get an idea of a core sample, try this experiment. You will drill core samples from an egg to see what it looks like inside.

Materials

- hard-boiled egg
- clear plastic drinking straw
- plastic knife
- scissors

Procedure

Crack and peel the shell off the hard-boiled egg.
