HEATING AND COOLING DEGREE-DAYS AND WINTER-COOLING

Objectives

Students will determine whether the winter cooling degree-day concept is useful as an index upon which to base decisions. Perhaps the most considerable aspect of winter heating is the winter cooling degree-day concept. Whether or not that concept is useful is the subject of this investigation. The cooling effect of temperature differences is the subject of this investigation. The cooling effect of temperature differences is the subject of this investigation. The cooling effect of temperature differences is the subject of this investigation.

After completing this investigation, you should be able to:

1. Calculate the number of heating or cooling degree-days accumulated over a given day and determine the use of temperature differences in determining the number of heating or cooling degree-days in a given location.
2. Calculate the number of heating or cooling degree-days accumulated over a given day and determine the use of temperature differences in determining the number of heating or cooling degree-days in a given location.
3. Calculate the number of heating or cooling degree-days accumulated over a given day and determine the use of temperature differences in determining the number of heating or cooling degree-days in a given location.

Background

1. Heating and cooling degree-days are the most commonly used index for determining the number of heating or cooling degree-days accumulated over a given day and determine the use of temperature differences in determining the number of heating or cooling degree-days in a given location. They are calculated by multiplying the average temperature difference between the indoor and outdoor air by the number of hours the temperature difference is maintained. For example, if the indoor temperature is 70°F and the outdoor temperature is 30°F, the heating degree-days for that day would be 40°F (70°F - 30°F) multiplied by 24 hours, or 960°F-hours. If the indoor temperature is 70°F and the outdoor temperature is 30°F, the heating degree-days for that day would be 40°F (70°F - 30°F) multiplied by 24 hours, or 960°F-hours.
