

Chapter 3

THE IOWA CLASS DESIGN

The question of how to proceed with capital ship development during the mid-1930s was perplexing. There seemed to be a lack of meaningful United States intelligence information concerning Japanese naval construction and fleet operations. The situation in January 1938 was still one of uncertainty as the Bu C & R continued its battleship studies. Only six months earlier, the US Navy had avoided the 'escalator clause' of the second London Treaty and adopted the 16-in gun for all new construction. This included the North Carolina and Washington, already on the ways, and 'battleship 1938', the South Dakota, which was in the contract design stage. Reports had been circulating since the previous November that the Japanese had laid down as many as three large battleships. It seemed certain that the United States would again use the 'escalator clause', this time to increase displacement to 45,000 tons.

The battleship studies proceeded with two different approaches as to how to utilize the expected 10,000 tons. Using the South Dakota as a starting point, the first approach was to increase the armament and protection, while the second was to attain high speed. The two studies were referred to as the 'slow battleship' and 'fast battleship' of 1938.

At this point, a review of the design and construction process used by the US Navy is helpful. The Bu C & R was responsible for the design of all new vessels which proceeded in three distinct phases: preliminary design, contract design and detail design. The first phase was handled by the Preliminary Design section which prepared design sketches based on various requirements initiated by the General Board. Upon approval by the General Board and the Secretary of the Navy, the next phase was the development of the contract drawings and specifications by the Contract Design section. Prospective shipbuilders based their bids on this material. In the final phase, the selected shipbuilder or the designated design agent was responsible for the preparation of the detail working drawings and finished plans. The Supervisor of Shipbuilding, assigned to the building yard,

When the Japanese withdrew from the second London Treaty in 1936 they immediately implemented their battleship building program which had been in the planning stage since 1930. It called for building seven Yamato class battleships of 65,000 tons, armed with nine 18.1-in/40-cal guns, and capable of 27 knots. Four were actually laid down. Two were completed as battleships. One was completed as an aircraft carrier and the fourth was cancelled and broken up on the ways. The Yamato is seen here running her speed trials off Sase Point on 22 October 1941.
