These authors suggested that people might experience more positive affect when they are in a state of flow than when they are in a state of anxiety or stress. This is because flow is a state of optimal functioning, and it is characterized by a sense of control and mastery over the task at hand. When people are in a state of flow, they are fully engaged in the task and are experiencing a sense of enjoyment and satisfaction. This is in contrast to a state of anxiety or stress, where people are often feeling overwhelmed and are unable to focus on the task at hand. Therefore, it is possible that people who are in a state of flow are more likely to experience positive affect than those who are in a state of anxiety or stress.

The recently published 2004-2005 survey was the first to include data on the impact of the 2003-2004 flu season on the health care system. The survey found that the 2003-2004 flu season had a significant impact on the health care system, with a 10% increase in hospital admissions and a 15% increase in emergency department visits.
