

THE TITANIC

Artistic Rendering of the Titanic

The Titanic was a massive passenger ship that some people called almost unsinkable.

It hit an iceberg on its first voyage across the Atlantic Ocean and sank near Newfoundland, Canada, killing more than 1,500 people. The wreckage was not found for more than 70 years.

The Ship

The Titanic was built in a shipyard in Ireland starting in 1909 and it took more than two years to be constructed. There were thousands of workers building the lavish ship, which had two main steam engines powered by 29 giant boilers.

The ship was supposed to be protected against water by its bulkhead compartments at the bottom of the ship. These bulkheads had electrical doors that could stop water flowing from one compartment to the next.

The problem was the walls separating each compartment were not high enough – so water could be stopped with the doors, but they could not stop it from going over the wall into the next compartment if the water rose high enough.

Another problem with the ship was that there weren't enough lifeboats on board. When the ship started sinking, many of the lifeboats were launched under capacity, meaning there was unused room for more people on the boats.

The Maiden Voyage

The Titanic left Southampton, England on April 10, 1912. It stopped in France and Ireland and then set sail across the Atlantic Ocean for New York. There were 2,240 people on the ship, including the crew.

Many of the passengers on board were from the upper-class of society, including business people, celebrities and dignitaries.
