Connecting Links

A connecting link is a component of a climbing system that connects other components. Ropes are one type of connecting link.

Ropes used in securing the climbing line or in moving upward must be self-closing and self-locking. Carabiners are available in a wide range of sizes, shapes, and constructions, with various locking mechanisms. Carabiners used in climbing must be self-closing and self-locking (triple-action). Carabiners must be used along their major axis. Quick link carabiners are connecting links; they should be used in a pinch. All connecting links must meet the minimum strength standards when used in a climbing system.

Split-Tails

Various "rope tools" are used in climbing, including hitch cords. A hitch cord is a separate, short rope used to tie a climbing hitch. A hitch cord is typically a small rope used in a climbing line and is used to secure the climbing line and is used to secure the climbing line. Hitch cords frequently are stitched or spliced.

Rope components used in a climbing system must meet the minimum strength standards for climbing lines.

Mechanical Friction Devices

Mechanical friction devices function in place of, or in addition to, a friction hitch. They provide friction on the climbing line for ascending and work positioning. Mechanical friction devices have a device that provides the additional friction on the climbing line. A climber using a mechanical friction device must secure a

Climbing

Climbing is a sport that involves ascending and descending a vertical or near-vertical surface. Climbing can be done on natural rock formations, artificial climbing walls, or ropes. Climbing is a popular outdoor activity and is often used for recreation, fitness, and professional purposes. Climbing requires strength, endurance, and technical skill.
