Connecting Links

A connecting link is a component of a climbing system that connects other components. Ropes are one type of connecting link.

Ropes used in securing the climbing line or in moving laryard must be self-closing and self-locking. Carabiners are available in a wide range of sizes, shapes, and constructions, with various locking mechanisms. Carabiners used in climbing must be self-closing and self-locking (triple-action). Carabiners must be used along their major axis. Quick link carabiners are connecting links; they should be used in a pinch. All connecting links must meet the minimum strength standards when used in a climbing system.

Split-Tails

Various "rope tools" are used in climbing, including hitch cords. A hitch cord is a separate, short rope used to tie a climbing hitch. It is typically a small rope used in the climbing line and is used to secure the climbing line and is used to secure the climbing line. Hitch cords frequently are stitched or spliced.

Rope components used in a climbing system must meet the minimum strength standards for climbing lines.

Mechanical Friction Devices

Mechanical friction devices function in place of, or in addition to, a friction hitch. They provide friction on the climbing line for ascending and work positioning. They have various designs and provide the additional friction needed to secure a climber using a rope.

Climbing

Climbing is a physical activity that involves ascending or descending a vertical or near-vertical surface. It is a sport that requires strength, endurance, and technique. Climbing is a popular outdoor activity that can be done in a variety of settings, including indoors and outdoors. Climbing is a challenging activity that can be done by people of all ages and abilities.

A throttle is a mechanical device that enables a climber to control the tension of a rope. It is used to secure a rope. Attached to the rope, it will grip in one direction (usually) and release in the other. Ascenders are used for ascending and descenders for descending. Toothed ascenders must be used on compatible ropes. In most configurations, two attachment points on the rope and/or a third are required.

Friction-saving devices, also referred to as friction-reducing devices, are devices that are used to reduce friction at the tie-in point in the tree. The most common designs employ rope or webbing loops at either end—double-ring type. Reducing friction at the tie-in point reduces wear on both the rope and the climber. While this reduces more consistent friction (and performance), it also creates additional friction at the friction hitch, so the climber must be sure to inspect their hitch cord or split-tail.
