

Reusing structural steel: what's in the new IStructE guide?

Florian Jones previews the guidance on reuse of structural steelwork that forms part of the Institution's forthcoming publication, Circular economy and reuse: guidance for designers.

As evidenced by the climate emergency fast-track in recent years, and the continued and increasing focus on sustainable design towards a net-zero future, there has been an increased focus on reuse of existing buildings. However, where a building cannot be repurposed or refitted, it creates a secondary approach to the reuse of buildings as a potential material bank, offering a source of structural steel resources for future projects.

More recently reported steel 'circularity levels', with assessments of steel recycled at the end of its last useful life globally¹, otherwise, well beyond 50% of steel used reported in the EU compared with only 35% reused², there is a clear opportunity to harness the greater reuse of steel. It is estimated that, in the UK, between 40–60% of steel building material could be then using steel recycled from decommissioned buildings³.

This article provides a brief introduction to Chapter 15 of the Institution's newly released Circular economy and reuse guide, which focuses on reuse of steel.

What's in the guide?

Chapter 15 begins by summarising the history and potential future benefits of reusing structural steelwork, with reuse steel being a carbon intensity as low as 10%⁴ compared with a steel of average of 1.7 times⁵ the new steelwork. It then considers the history of building project and global emissions, noting that, as a result of reuse, if reused steel increases the total steel tonnage of a design by more than 30% compared with a new steel, it may be better than a green element for design the steel.

This chapter then goes on to look at options for reusing structural steelwork and the guide to available resources. These are first listed as presented in descending order from highest to lowest potential and then categorised as follows:

- 1. Reuse steelwork in situ within an existing building
- 2. Reuse steelwork as part of an existing steel-framed structure in a different location
- 3. Reuse individual members as is, or cut and use as purlins
- 4. Reuse as reinforcement

Figure 15.1 is a broad overview of the guide, with Chapter 15 focusing on options 3–4 which require relocation of the steel.

Table 1: Available guidance relating to reuse of steel (adapted from Table 2 of Chapter 15)
