

15 Direct and indirect effects of genetically modified plants on the honey bee

M.H. Pham-Delègue, Lise Jouanin, and J.C. Sautou

Summary

In this chapter we consider genetically modified (GM) oilseed rape–honey bee interactions, and some studies that could affect plant attractiveness to bees. We report observations on the foraging behavior of honey bees in situations of choice between GM oilseed rape expressing different genes and untransformed ones. Studies were conducted under controlled, semi-field, and field conditions, and no differential behavior was found between GM and control genotypes. To evaluate the risk of direct exposure, we investigated the amounts of gene products expressed in nectar and pollen. In the plant material under test, no transgene proteins were detected, which indicates that the risk of exposure to the pesticides is reduced. Differences were found between GM and control genotypes in nectar and floral odor composition. However, it was shown that foragers did not discriminate among the genotypes, and that they could learn the olfactory signals from GM plants as well as from control plants. From these studies, it appears that even though the bees can be exposed to the gene products or subjected to secondary changes in the plant chemistry, these changes do not lead to noticeable modifications in the behavior of the honey bee for the genotypes tested.

Introduction

Mutual benefits between plants and pollination vectors such as honey bees rely on the ability of bees to discover flowers providing nectar and pollen, to recognize plant characteristics (floral color and shape, and chemical cues), and to communicate information within the hive leading to the recruitment of new foragers. These interactions can be affected by the genetic transformation of melliferous plants. In order to assess possible risks of genetically modified (GM) plants on bees, two types of effects must be considered: bees could be affected by direct exposure to the gene product either when foragers feed on concentrated nectar or pollen or when they feed on stored food, corresponding to short-term and long-term
