

may sensibly be seen as the two central theses of the human development approach.”⁵ From the outset, the human development approach was oriented towards practical analyses and policies to advance well-being, emphasizing local and national public debates of alternative policy options.

Powerful related themes enunciated in the initial statements addressed deprivation, inequality and empowerment. The 1990 HDR described the considerable inequalities within countries that mask the continuing severe deprivation of many people. It highlighted differences between rural and urban dwellers, men and women, rich and poor people. And at its core was a strong emphasis on political freedom, voice, accountability and democratic practice.⁶ These are early examples of the HDR being ahead of the curve, an attribute that continues to characterize the Report.

The Human Development Index

The Human Development Index (HDI) was a strategic element in the new approach. It symbolizes the shift in thinking, even if not fully capturing human development’s richness. As a composite measure of health, education and income, the HDI assesses levels and progress using a concept of development much broader than that allowed by income alone (figure 1.1). And as with any aggregate measure and international comparison, it simplifies and captures only part of what human development entails.

Over the past 20 years the HDI has received its share of criticism. Some take issue with its construction and composition. Others suggest that it be expanded to include more dimensions, ranging from gender equity to biodiversity. Many concerns are valid. But the objective is not to build an unassailable indicator of well-being—it is to redirect attention towards human-centred development and to promote debate over how we advance the progress of societies. The more we discuss what should or should not be included in the HDI—whether it makes sense to lump distinct categories together, how much importance to accord to each category, how to obtain more and better data—the more the debate moves away from the single-minded focus on growth that pervaded thinking about development.

The HDI—three dimensions and four indicators

Note: The indicators presented in this figure follow the new methodology as defined in box 1.2.
