Further genetic studies of some, nonrecombining selfing sites, and their association with recombining sites on the same chromosome suggest different evolutionary histories for the two sets of nuclear markers. This is consistent with the fact that chloroplast markers have not recombined in any of the examined populations. These results and some others indicate that the selfing sites may constitute nonrecombining, and other sites on the same nuclei function as recombining sites in some populations. The results also suggest that the chloroplast genome is highly conserved and that the nuclear genome is highly divergent.

Further genetic studies are needed, since numerous self-pollinating Alb. and Alba accessions still contained transgressive or transgressive-like progeny offspring over subsequent 100 years across all genetic markers, with several transgressive offspring progeny offspring still self-pollinating as in Alba accessions.
