

Taking relationships to new heights

Technology infrastructure

When Boeing first commercially developed engines for new flight in 1988, it was still a relatively small company. The 787 Dreamliner, however, was a massive undertaking. It required a global network of suppliers, many of whom were not even in existence when the project began. To ensure the success of the program, Boeing had to build a new infrastructure from the ground up. This infrastructure included a new supply chain, a new manufacturing process, and a new way of working. The result was a more efficient and cost-effective way of producing aircraft. This infrastructure also allowed Boeing to take on larger and more complex projects in the future.

Boeing's global network of suppliers and manufacturing facilities is a key part of its success. This infrastructure allows Boeing to produce aircraft more efficiently and at a lower cost. It also allows Boeing to take on larger and more complex projects in the future.
