Instructions: Read the following passage about the concept of Urban planning in Human Geography. Then answer the questions on the information.

Urban planning is a multifaceted discipline that guides the development and management of cities and towns. It seeks to create livable, sustainable, and equitable communities by addressing complex challenges related to housing, transportation, land use, infrastructure, and the environment. Urban planners act as intermediaries, balancing the interests of residents, businesses, developers, and policymakers.

At its core, urban planning is fundamentally concerned with human geography. Planners consider demographic trends, social needs, economic activity, and cultural values when making decisions that shape the spatial distribution of resources, amenities, and opportunities across the urban landscape. The goal is to create places where people can live, work, and thrive.

Urban planners use various tools and strategies, including zoning ordinances, master plans, transportation studies, and environmental impact assessments. They collaborate with architects, engineers, economists, and community stakeholders to envision and implement plans that address both present-day challenges and long-term sustainability.

Historically, urban planning has faced criticism for both top-down approaches that disregarded community voices and for contributing to urban sprawl and social inequities. Contemporary urban planning emphasizes public participation, placemaking, and
