These two theories imply similar, but opposite, views of the relationship between the individual and the group. In the first, the individual is seen as the primary unit of analysis, and the group is seen as a collection of individuals. In the second, the group is seen as the primary unit of analysis, and the individual is seen as a member of the group. The first view is more consistent with the idea of individualism, and the second view is more consistent with the idea of collectivism.
