There is a long history of research on the effects of stress on the immune system. In 1975, Selye introduced the concept of the "stress response" and its effects on the body. Since then, many studies have shown that stress can suppress the immune system, making the body more susceptible to infections and diseases. This is because stress triggers the release of hormones like cortisol, which can interfere with the function of immune cells. For example, stress can reduce the production of antibodies and the activity of T-cells, which are crucial for fighting off pathogens. Additionally, stress can lead to chronic inflammation, which is a common feature of many autoimmune diseases. Understanding the link between stress and the immune system is important for developing strategies to manage stress and maintain overall health.
