Where the law is in doubt, counsel's duty is to discuss it with the client and to advise the client on the basis of that discussion.

There is no reason to be afraid of cross-examination, or that counsel will be the cause of their breakdown. Just as counsel can help the client understand the law, the client can help counsel understand the facts. Counsel should be prepared to ask the client questions that may seem to be leading, or to ask the client to explain the facts in their own words.

There is no reason to be afraid of the client's reaction to the law. Counsel should be prepared to explain the law in a way that the client can understand, and to explain the consequences of the law in a way that the client can understand.
