The Market

- Since the last edition was published, the new Linux 2.6 kernel has been released, and is now the default kernel for most major Linux distributions. It brings with it a suite of security capabilities not previously available without hand patching.

Key Features and Benefits

- This new edition is completely written from scratch by a global team of open-source Linux security experts.
- Complete coverage of the new security options in the Linux 2.6 kernel.
- Brand-new Wireless, VoIP, RFID, and Web Services hacks and countermeasures.
- Continues to be as distribution agnostic as possible, covering the latest versions of Fedora, Red Hat Enterprise Linux and SuSE Linux, as well as a breadth of server products whenever appropriate.

About the Authors

ISECOM (the Institute for Security and Open Methodologies), is an open, collaborative, security research community established in January 2001. In order to fulfill its mission focus to apply critical thinking and scientific methodology to all facets of security, ISECOM is chartered as a commercial-free and non-partisan organisation. The ISECOM Board of Directors reflects many countries representing thousands of members and volunteers from around the world. In a world of increasing commercial and industrial misrepresentation of security, ISECOM enables logical and rational decision-making in all aspects of security, integrity, privacy, and safety.
