

The Box requires very little power—we saw one connected to a portable rechargeable battery—so you could conceivably connect it directly to the regular, older USB port on your router or computer.

To set up the Box, download either its associated Android or iOS app (sorry Windows Phone owners; you're still protected, but your device can't be used to configure the Box) and create an account. If you already have a MyBitdefender account from one of the company's other products, you can just sign in with that. Bitdefender Box has a long list of supported routers; for those, the app will communicate through your Wi-Fi network and set up the Box automatically. If your router isn't supported, you simply enter your router's control panel and switch off DHCP. The Box should be able to take it from there. The company provides detailed manual setup instructions for different router models on the support page of its website.

Once activated, the Box app will populate with the devices on your network. For the average home with just a handful of devices, this will be a snap. For the super-geeky home with tons of devices, the procedure is a little more challenging.

Our network testing environment is powered by a Netgear Nighthawk router and only has a few devices on it, but even that was confusing. On the network tab of the app (the center one) you'll see your Family devices and your Guest devices. Anything that connects to your network will appear as a Guest in the app, identified by cryptic descriptors like "A smart TV" or "BLACKBERRY-B5D9." You can rename these devices, add images, and even associate them with contacts from your address book, but because Bitdefender doesn't show you the MAC or IP address, figuring out which device is which can be tricky.

MOBILE SETUP

Use Bitdefender's mobile app to set up the Box, or sign into your preexisting account. You may run into trouble if there are a lot of devices on your network.
