

Implicit Attitude Measures

Arguably, one of the most thriving research areas in current psychology is assessing attitudes and related constructs with implicit measures, which we define as those indirect measures that rely on response latencies or other indices of spontaneous trait association, the activation of action semantics, or even real behavior. This research area is united by a shared excitement about the discoveries enabled by these measures, be they related to social attitudes and behavior, clinical disorders, consumer decisions, or self-representations, among others. As this enumeration suggests, in spite of the common excitement about the new research questions implicit measures allow us to investigate, there is much diversity in this research. First of all, these approaches bridge subdisciplines of psychology traditionally characterized by little cross-talk. Furthermore, the variety of implicit measures used is already broad and still growing, given variants and implementations of these implicit measures in different samples and research approaches. Given this diversity, we deemed it appropriate to summarize research that focuses either on the comparison of different implicit measures or on the mechanisms underlying one of the measures. Such knowledge is necessary and helpful to determine which measure to employ in a given research context and also to be aware of limitations of certain measures and advantages of others. Thus, the articles collected in this special issue compare two or more different implicit measures, or they focus on the measurement properties of one.

One of the mostly used implicit measures, the Implicit Association Test (IAT; Greenwald, McGhee, & Schwartz, 1998), was introduced in a way that would have allowed researchers to implement it as if it was a standardized test. In spite of this, researchers not only used stimuli, numbers of trials, evaluation procedures, and other specifics different from those suggested; but in the end, they even suggested their own variants of IATs or implicit measures that keep certain aspects of IATs while eliminating or adding others (e.g., De Houwer, 2003; Nosek & Banaji, 2001; Olson & Fazio, 2004; Sriram & Greenwald, 2009; Steffens, Kirschbaum, & Glades, 2008). As a first consequence, the answer to the question how a "good" IAT should be constructed is not as clean and tidy anymore as it appeared in 1998. As a second consequence of these methodological debates IAT research now comprises a diversity at the expense of addressing comparisons with other implicit measures (the implicit-explicit relation on the contrary has been attended to, e.g., Hofmann, Gawronski, Gschwendner, Le, & Schmitt, 2005).

Matters get much more complicated if we add other implicit measures to this cocktail, the most prominent ones among them being based on priming effects (Fazio, Sanbonmatsu, Powell, & Kardes, 1986; Payne, Cheng, Govorun, & Stewart, 2005), but many recent ones based on approach-avoidance reactions (see Reinecke, Becker, & Rinck, 2010). Whereas some research has systematically compared different implicit measures and found disturbing discrepancies among them (e.g., Bosson, Swann, & Pennebaker, 2000) and among the mechanisms underlying them (e.g., Gawronski & Bodenhausen, 2003; Wittenbrink, Judd, & Park, 2001), such research is the exception rather than the rule, compared to the enormous number of studies applying implicit measures. On top of that, some types of implicit measures have not yet reached a consolidation level that would allow these comparisons, but are still dealing with the analysis of the robustness and determinants of the respective effects. For instance, this is the case for automatic behavior activation following categorical primes where it still needs to be figured out what kind of behavior is being activated and when (Jonas & Sassenberg, 2006). Consequently, we believe that few informed decisions can be made which implicit measure is most appropriate for a given research question. Of course, this is not to say that we know nothing. For instance, we know that a measure such as subliminal priming is preferable if we want to assess social cognition in the absence of conscious perception of stimuli, and such measures may yield reliable interindividual differences (e.g., Bianchi, Mummendey, Steffens, & Yzerbyt, in press). On the contrary, we know that even if participants do not control their responses during an IAT, they will afterwards have a pretty clear idea which constructs were assessed (e.g., Steffens, 2004), thus, the latter measures are certainly less implicit than the former (cf. Dasgupta, 2010). Whereas we know that subliminal measures may yield replicable effects (Draine & Greenwald, 1998), it is possible that they yield less reliable findings than other measures. So what we do not know is under what conditions and for which research questions an IAT outperforms a priming paradigm or an approach-avoidance dependent measure, and vice versa. For example, when there was no consensus on the
