ABSTRACT

In this paper, we describe our project DemoMedia, a software demonstrator that combines hypertext and recommender functionality in the context of video acquisition or use. DemoMedia fills the gap that exists in today's video platforms which include recommender functionalities, but only trivial support for users to structure information. Thus, users are forced to write down notes from or about videos (needed for various reasons) on additional media, such as paper. This opens a media gap between video platform and note-taking or communication to others.

DemoMedia becomes a note taking and communication tool for the user, as it offers a knowledge space on which users can freely arrange and associate information. Furthermore, its intelligent parsers compute relations that are implicitly expressed and queries knowledge bases for relevant information or related videos. Those get positioned on the space in a semantically meaningful way. DemoMedia and the underlying component-based open hypermedia system Mother combine both the machine's capability of extracting knowledge from huge amounts of data and the human capability of sensemaking, intuition, and creativity.

1 INTRODUCTION

Hypertext as a medium enables people to create connections between information. It breaks up the stringed information flow enforced by other structure types, such as linear structures (e.g., how we mostly read books) or hierarchical structures (e.g., as the file system browser forces us to organize files). The use of links in hypertext opens a higher level of freedom and enables users to express their associations freely. This supports the way we think, as it enables the creation of appropriate tools for expressing our thoughts. Once explicitly expressed in a computing environment, it becomes easy to communicate them to other people in various ways, for example, in front of a single shared screen during a face-to-face meeting or over computer networks. It is no surprise that Conklin recognized in his 1987 paper hypertext as a "computer-based medium for thinking and communication" [12].

We consider hypertext as a tool for augmenting human capabilities in thinking or organizing information, as described by Douglas Engelbart. He defines augmentation as follows: "By 'augmenting human intellect' we mean increasing the capabilities of an individual to approach a complex problem situation, to analyze it, to select a solution that suits his particular needs, and to communicate it" [10].

Today, organizations use hypertext to support their internal tasks in various ways. It is used to structure information, to organize information, to support decision making, to inform users, to support learning, and so on. In many cases, information is structured in a way that suits the needs of the user. This is often done by organizing information on such systems in mainly linear or hierarchical ways (e.g., shopping lists or media play-lists). In many cases, not even hierarchical structuring is possible, as we know it from many computer applications.

On the one hand, the AI part, which is a huge topic of its own, becomes more and more important and omnipresent. On the other hand, support for structuring tools for the human user decreases. It seems that an increasing level of automation tasks decreases
