

Examining the Middle Passage & Slave Trade

Directions: In the early 1500's, European colonists in the Americas needed cheap labor for their plantations and farms and began using enslaved Africans. After reading and analyzing the slave trade and Middle Passage, complete the graphic organizer below with information from what you learned.

| Causes of African Slavery | Effects of African Slavery |
|---|--|
| European ships sailed along the West African coast to avoid Muslim North Africa, which was stronger and more unified. Western Africa was made up of many separate groups and European trading posts were built. The demand for labor in the New World was so strong that captured slaves became very valuable. | On Africa... Wars were intensified with new weapons being imported. Families and communities were destroyed by the slave trade. The fragmented states had a hard time uniting to effectively fight against the slave trade. On the Caribbean... There were huge plantations in the Caribbean with hundreds of slaves. The mortality rate was extremely high and they relied on new slave ships to maintain the work force. On America... More slaves were born in America than Africa as the years progressed (unlike in the Caribbean). Concentrated in the South on plantations for tobacco, rice, or indigo. They were crucial to the economy's development in the American colonies. |
| The Middle Passage | |
| An extremely dangerous and miserable experience for captured and enslaved Africans. They were separated by sex, kept naked, and packed incredibly close together and chained together for long periods for the months long journey. Ships might be designed to hold no more than 350 people but were packed with more than 800. Over 10% of those who started the trip died along the way as abuse and punishments were common. | |

Genghis Khan and the Mongols
