

SECTION 2 Science as a Process *continuedTESTING THE HYPOTHESIS

After scientists form a hypothesis, they look for ways to test it in an investigation. In some investigations, the scientist will make more observations and see if they fit the hypothesis. For example, a scientist may use tools to study the movements of cool and warm air. He could use the measurements he takes to learn whether cool air moves into an area after a thunderstorm.

In other investigations, a scientist will do an experiment to test a hypothesis. An experiment is a set of procedures that a scientist carries out. Every experiment has conditions or factors that can change. These factors are called variables. There are two types of variables. Independent variables are factors that the scientist changes. Dependent variables are factors that change as a result of the independent variables. □

For example, suppose a scientist did an experiment to learn how water affects a plant's growth. The independent variable is the amount of water the plants get. The dependent variable is how much the plants grow. In this experiment, the scientist would change only the amount of water each plant gets. She would keep all other conditions, such as amount of sunlight, temperature, and type of plant, the same.

This astronaut, Shannon Lucid, is observing wheat plants growing in space. Experiments like this one will help scientists learn how plants grow in space where the pull of Earth's gravity is weaker.

DRAWING CONCLUSIONS

Scientists must decide if their observations support the hypothesis, or show that the hypothesis was correct. In many cases, the results of an experiment are unexpected. If the results do not support the hypothesis, the scientists must throw out the hypothesis or change it. Unexpected results are important to science. They can cause scientists to ask new questions.
