

CONDENSATE MECHANICS

Condensate forms in air conditioning systems and industrial processes and is a problem. Some condensate collection and disposal (e.g., through drain pans) has been developed and is used widely in industry today.

Condensate is highly acidic (pH is typically 3-4) and contains suspended solids and oil. These acidic fluids must then be disposed of properly and not poured in drain lines or poured in unapproved storage tanks. These acidic fluids can also be used in some industrial applications, in addition to water, in order to save costs that are used to heat fluid used for processing and other heating processes.

Other Condensate Issues

Other issues include air conditioning system condensation, water-based heating systems, boiler control of steam condensation, and other issues.
