

THE MARCH OF PRESIDENTS

18. The first part of the page, the first paragraph, is the starting point.

■ Example: The hypothesis that the strategy to increase productivity among students is to increase class power. The predicted result is that as power in the classroom increases, productivity increases.

1.4.1.4. Indistinguishable Events In the model, there is a great deal of uncertainty as to what events are distinguishable. This is left as a difficult problem for the modeler to solve. In the model, the events are assumed to be distinguishable, but the modeler must be able to distinguish between events that are distinguishable in the model and events that are not distinguishable in the model. This is a difficult problem to solve, but it is a necessary part of the model. The modeler must be able to distinguish between events that are distinguishable in the model and events that are not distinguishable in the model. This is a difficult problem to solve, but it is a necessary part of the model. The modeler must be able to distinguish between events that are distinguishable in the model and events that are not distinguishable in the model. This is a difficult problem to solve, but it is a necessary part of the model.

Mr. KATZ. Indeed I regret nothing, except perhaps that we will not be able to reach the end of the road, as it were, before the end of the world.
