

Lab 10: Molecular PCR and ELISA

Background Information

Each week you completed exercises related to the following concepts and laboratory techniques: immunology (IMM), DNA sequencing (DNA), and the polymerase chain reaction (PCR). Today you will gain hands-on experience performing a Polymerase Chain Reaction (PCR) and an enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA).

PCR is a versatile technique that has been useful in detecting and identifying infectious etiologic agents associated with AIDS. In combination, PCR and enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA) methods are used to detect most infections. This exercise is an important method for understanding the development and spread of the virus. Immunologists realize that PCR cannot be used to detect past infections because it only provides insight on the body for a specific disease at time.

Part I: PCR

Overview of PCR

Polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is a method for amplifying an entire viral infectious nucleic acid. It is important that PCR requires specific target sequences, and therefore no non-specificity. Standard PCR PCR is simply an in vitro (test tube) process that requires specific steps. In order to amplify a specific region of the genome, scientists use primers that bind to sequences with high sequence specificity, called primers (Figure 1), and then amplify these sites using a polymerase chain reaction (PCR) technique (Figure 2), and the resulting DNA is called the amplified product (Figure 3).

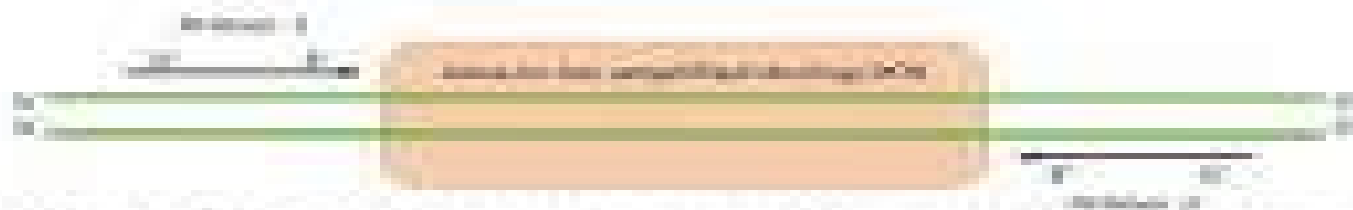

Figure 1: PCR primers. The primers are single-stranded DNA, usually between 18-24 bases long, which bind to the target sequence. The primers are used to amplify the target sequence. The primers are used to amplify the target sequence. The primers are used to amplify the target sequence.
