Sex Differences in Risky Adolescent Behavior Ashley C. Jordan,2013 Adolescence is a unique time during the human lifespan where children develop into reproductively competent adults and many behavioral and psychological changes develop The goal of this dissertation is to examine the underlying functions related to the emergence of risky adolescent behaviors broadly defined to include both physical risks e.g. drinking or physical fighting and psychological risks e.g. anxious or depressive symptoms In this paper I 1 present a manuscript reviewing and synthesizing the relevant evolutionary theories which bears testable hypotheses regarding sex differences in risky adolescent behavior and 2 empirically assess these predictions in two separate but theoretically and conceptually related studies that test for theoretically based hypothesized relations one specific to males one to females Specifically I test the proposition that males should be more likely to engage in physically risky behavior than females and that females should be more likely to engage in affective risks assessed as sensitivity to social evaluation These hypotheses are generally supported but shed light on important environmental factors that are associated with the prevalence of risk taking including the degree of closeness within the family timing of pubertal development and social status In general an early pubertal development and low social status are associated with risk taking while closeness to family buffers against the likelihood of engaging in later risky behaviors Behavioral Economic Risk Factors for Risky Sexual Behavior in a College Student Sample Rachel Jordan Brooks, 2013 The years spent in college are a period of increased risky sexual behavior RSB RSB includes any behavior s that increases the likelihood of negative consequences associated with sexual contact Variables such as gender and alcohol use are predictors of RSB but our understanding of RSB and predictors is incomplete Delay Discounting DD Consideration of Future Consequences CFC and Relative Reinforcing Efficacy RRE have been implicated in health risk behaviors and may predict engagement in RSB among students We examined the relationship between these variables established predictors e g impulsivity and RSB among students N 364 76% female controlling for gender ethnicity drinking and relationship status When entered together in one model RRE was the most robust predictors of RSB in our sample DD was also significant In separate models trait impulsivity accounted for the largest amount of variance compared to all other predictors These results suggest the value of sexual activity relative to other reinforcers may play an important role in RSB Canadian Books in Print ,1975
