

Guide for Emerging Researchers

Elvis Fosso-Kankeu

Abstract— This research booklet was compiled to guide postgraduate students and emerging researchers through their research career development. The sections covered within the booklet aim to equip the reader with necessary tools needed to choose an area of innovative research, proposal writing, publishing in accredited journals, supervision of postgraduate students and measuring one's research impact. The content within the booklet has been written in a comprehensive and easy-to-follow manner to ensure that reader is captivated from the onset till the end.

Keywords—Emerging researchers, research guideline, research ethics, writing research paper, writing proposal, measuring research impact.

I. INTRODUCTION

Research can be a daunting task for academic staff especially for those colleagues who have been recruited without prior experience in research and are still busy completing their postgraduate degrees. This category of researchers also called early career researchers often face a significant challenge in finding enough time to simultaneously manage teaching, research and administrative responsibilities. It has recently become part of my professional responsibilities to assist such colleagues with their academic research tasks. I have also in the past few years played coaching role for younger academic fellows around the country, giving motivational talks at workshops and lectures to pave the way toward research achievements. Although time has always been an issue for all the scholars, I have come to realize that for younger colleagues without prior experience in research or for early career researchers in general, the main challenges have been either the fear of the unknown or the lack of appropriate strategy to engage in research when there is minimal or no resources (funding and laboratory facilities, to name a few). It becomes therefore obvious that without adequate mentorship in any form, these colleagues will hardly make it in the field of research. The starting point will be to get adequate postgraduate qualifications that provide enough training in a specific field of research from research proposal writing to publication of journal articles. It is however not yet the case as many academic staff still struggle to complete their degrees after several years of registration. This is also confirmed by recent statistics in the reports published by the Department of Higher Education and Training (DHET) in South Africa, according to these reports, there is concern regarding the percentage of academic staff who hold doctoral degrees. The DHET has therefore taken a big step to increase the number of academic staff who hold doctorates by introducing for example the university capacity development programme which will contribute among other to the support of staff who enroll for postgraduate studies.

As part of my continuous contribution to the university capacity development programme, I have decided to compile this research booklet which will assist many researchers in finding adequate strategy to shape their research career especially under the circumstances of limited resources, to acquire effective writing skills (proposals and publications), adopt an ethical approach at every stage of scientific inquiry and to contribute toward the creation of new knowledge and the development of the community..

II. THE PATH TO BECOMING AN ESTABLISHED RESEARCHER

A. ACQUIRE A SUITABLE QUALIFICATION

A four-year university undergraduate degree (Honours, BEng, BTech) that involves research methodology and research project as part of the curriculum is generally the minimum qualification required to carry out academic research at the starting position (e.g. research assistant); however, to have an independent position and be able to manage projects and supervise students, a masters degree is often ideal. It is however not enough to be competitive and progress in the field. In South Africa many institutions prefer to recruit PhD holders in positions involving research responsibilities, because they have acquired written communication skills during their training and have probably already published few journal articles, which give them the necessary knowledge and skills to supervise postgraduate students. For the staff who have been recruited without a PhD qualification, they are now required to register and complete their degree in a specific time which can be quite challenging given their teaching loads.

It is always important to acquire a qualification in the field of your research interest as this will give you an edge in addressing specific issues relevant for that field.

B. CHOOSE A RESEARCH AREA

Your choice of research area must be among the factors that will help you grow in that specific field; for examples, your personal interest (you must not choose something that you do not enjoy doing as you will be quickly discouraged to carry on), your short and long term goals, the opportunities, availability of fundings, the relevance to the society and/or industry and advancement of knowledge.
