Classification Accuracy of I-Ready Diagnostic for High-stakes Exam Outcomes for Elementary School Students Kayla V. Campaña, 2023 The purpose of the present study was to compare the classification accuracy of a previous year s end of year state assessment a computer adaptive diagnostic assessment i Ready and the combination of the previous year s end of year state assessment with the following year s i Ready performance to predict the rate of students passing or failing the following year's end of year state assessment in English Language Arts/ELA and math. This was conducted to determine whether iReady as an additional screening measure is necessary to identify students who are at risk of failing the upcoming end of year assessment and are in need of tiered intervention supports or if the previous year's end of year assessment is sufficient for this purpose. Overall for the population of students represented in this study, the previous year's end of year state assessment yielded stronger classification accuracy over the use of the fall or winter iReady diagnostic assessment. The combination of iReady with the previous year's state test demonstrated minimally greater strength in determining student risk level. Moreover, the previous year's end of year assessment serves as economically advantageous over administering iReady as an additional screening assessment to determine risk and inform decisions within a multi-tiered system of supports. Implications of these findings and recommendations for further research are discussed.
