

IBM PROTECTIER REPLICATION FOR OUTSTANDING DATA PROTECTION

OCTOBER 2011

painfully slow.

Traditional tape backup is pulling apart at the seams. Tape requires manual intervention to manage which leaves backup data wide open to human error. Transporting tape also exposes data to the risk of loss and off-site storage facilities are costly. Testing disaster recovery (DR) plans in this manual environment is an exercise in futility, and even when the process works restoring data from tape is

The basic answer is disk-based backup with replication. However, this very basic scenario is no miracle cure. Storing straight backup data on disk can quickly overwhelm disk storage resources, at which point IT sets up large-scale copy-to-tape – and ends up with the same tape problem they started with. Replication too can be very expensive in terms of bandwidth, and even a single set-and-forget unidirectional copy can be quite costly. It also lacks flexible replication features that today's backup environments require for their Tier 1 and even Tier 2 applications.

Fig. 1: The Data Protection Trifecta

Modern backup and recovery needs much robust business continuity (BC) and DR than garden variety approaches can provide. Organizations require a trifecta of data protection operations: high-performance deduplicated backup; simultaneous replication that is bandwidth-efficient, flexible and offers 100% data integrity; and high-speed restore with failover and fallback options.

This is why IBM ProtectTier with advanced replication is a vital piece of backup and recovery. ProtectTier deduplicates incoming backup streams for extremely efficient disk-based storage and simultaneously replicates data. ProtectTier has offered native unidirectional replication for years but IBM has now developed far beyond that to include many-to-one and many-to-many replication options. Replicating only deduplicated, new and unique data makes it extremely bandwidth-efficient.

This Solution Profile makes the case for replication as a data protection cornerstone, positions replication in the context of customer DR environments, and explores how IBM ProtectTier's powerful replication dramatically enhances BC and DR across mid-tier business and the enterprise.
