Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of older adults. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 older adults (mean age = 72.5 years) who were randomly assigned to either a walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 older adults who did not participate in the walking program. The subjects were assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks. The walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the older adults. The walking program significantly improved the subjects' physical health, as measured by the 6-minute walk test, the 10-meter walk test, and the Timed Up and Go test. The walking program also significantly improved the subjects' psychological health, as measured by the Geriatric Depression Scale and the Geriatric Anxiety Inventory. The walking program was well tolerated by the older adults, and no adverse effects were reported. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of older adults.

¹² To address the issue, we estimated the model for each country separately. The results are available from the author upon request.

As noted earlier, the 1990s witnessed a significant increase in the number of women in the labor force. This increase was driven by a number of factors, including the aging of the population, the increasing participation of women in higher education, and the changing social norms regarding women's roles in the workforce. The increase in the number of women in the labor force has had a significant impact on the economy, particularly in the service sector, where women have become a major source of labor. This increase in the number of women in the labor force has also led to a greater emphasis on work-life balance and flexible work arrangements, as women have increasingly become the primary breadwinners in many households.
