

Lab 10: Molecular PCR and ELISA

Background Information

Each week you completed exercises related to the following concepts and laboratory techniques: immunology (IMM), DNA sequencing (DNA), and the polymerase chain reaction (PCR). Today you will gain hands-on experience performing a Polymerase Chain Reaction (PCR) and an enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA).

PCR is a versatile technique that has been useful in detecting and identifying infectious etiologic agents associated with AIDS. In combination, specific antibody-based infection, also the enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA) method. However, an ELISA can be used to detect most infections, this exercise is important to further understanding the development and associated test of an ELISA. ELISA is a sensitive method that can be used to detect and identify antibodies or more specifically an antibody to a specific antigen at a time.

Part I: PCR

Overview of PCR

Polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is a method for amplifying an entire viral infectious agent. Each of the individual base pairs within specific target sequences, and through the polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is able to be an entire target sequence. PCR is a simple process. In order to amplify a specific region of the genome, scientists use primers that bind to sequences with high sequence similarity. Polymerase (Figure 1) and the resulting DNA strand, called the polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is primarily followed by an amplification of the PCR.

Figure 1: PCR process. The process of PCR is shown with a double-stranded DNA template. The primer binds to one strand, and the polymerase extends the primer, creating a new strand. The process is repeated, resulting in exponential amplification of the target sequence.
