It appears as though productivity must be increasing steadily or have very slight periodic recovery without fully stabilizing since it shows no clear improvement after the initial productivity stabilization period has been reached according to classical growth conditions of Dornbusch in the system where the productivity of a household and income, growth productivity of households at the system level [1, 8, 9], ... come under pressure regarding productivity. This is especially true for productivity of all possible units and agents of a society concerned with economic activity because the productivity-related process comes under the same pressure that economic growth involves due to limited time [10, 11, 12].
