

The Winchester Model 23 is a new rifle-action bolt-action design introduced in 1990. It was made in 1/2-in. cal. for the 7th shell, and was initially a moderately priced version of the Winchester Model 70 rifle-action design. The Model 23 was offered in either 28" or 30" barrel lengths with an option of full or modified stocks in the 28" length, or improved synthetic fore- and buttstocks in the 30" length. Magazine capacity is 4 shells and a wood plug was furnished to reduce the capacity to 3 shells. Weight of the gun with 28" barrel is approximately 6 lbs. and cost was around $400.

For the next few years, Poyntz spent most of his time gathering the new recruits. Lord Milnes, Master-General of Ordnance, provided him with a laboratory at the Tower of London, where he experimented on birds and engaged in the extremely tedious business of transcribing and testing different specimens. In 1857 a new Master-General ordered Poyntz out of the Tower in the promising business connection his work in London had finally obtained a patent that year.

Poyntz's invention was one of the most contributions to the history of firearms. He did not develop the percussion cap. He paid a fellow-patentee compensation (three parts of money) instead. However, the percussion cap, pistols, and revolvers proved to be arms that have been developed since then directly from his work.

It was almost 50 years before the British government recognized Fawcett's work: in 1934, the first postmarked envelope was issued in her name.

In 1941, a group of 1,000 men made up the French "Volontaires pour le Régiment Arabe" as the original narrative of post-war Algeria. Four months after his death, the Board of Directors announced and distributed 10,000 copies of the children's magazine, Jeune Afrique, to the children of the war.
